KALI (Lat.), n. n. indecl. Ka(ka^3)'li(le). Ger., K. 1. Potash. For many compounds, see under KALIUM. The Germans use the terms indifferently, as in the case of the Latin compounds, and as in our popular use of the words potassium and potash. Thus, essigsaures K. and essigsaures Kalium are both used, although the latter is the more in accordance with modern chemical nomenclature. [B.] 2. The Salicornia herbacea. 3. Of Gray, a section of the genus Chenopodium. 4. Of Tournefort, a section of the genus Salsola. [B, 42, 121 (a, 35).]—Acidulated k. Potassium acetate. [a, 38.]—Aetzk' (Ger.). It may occur in early childhood or at the period of puberty, or later, or it may be intra-uterine. There may also, though rarely, be a development of blood-vessels. There are three forms, characterized by ulcers, infiltration, and abscess. By some this term is restricted to the deep non-suppurative form of k. [B; F.]—K. punctata. Fr., kératite ponctuée (ou en points). Fr., kératoscopie. Ger., Keratoskopie. An incorrect term for a method of determining the refraction of an eye by inspecting the reflex from the pupil; also called skiascopy, retinoscopy, pupilloscopy, and the shadow test. In performing it the observer stations himself at a distance of 1 metre from the patient, and throws a beam of light upon the eye to be examined with a concave mirror which rotates slowly on its axis. As he does so, a shadow moves out from the edge of the pupil and across the field of the latter. He then places convex or concave glasses before the eye until the movement of the shadow takes place in the reverse direction. The glass which accomplishes this reversal, less 1 dioptre if it is a convex glass, or plus 1 dioptre if it is a concave glass, is a measure of the ametropia. This method is independent of the refraction of the observer's eye. [B.]

KETONE, n. Ke'ton. Fr., kétone. Ger., Keton. An oxidation product of a secondary alcohol, thus bearing the same relation to the latter that an aldehyde does to a primary alcohol. The k's are derived from the series of bivalent hydrocarbons by the combination of the latter with one atom of oxygen which is united directly with a carbon atom that is itself in direct combination with two other carbon atoms. Or a k. may be regarded as a compound of carboxyl (CO) with two univalent hydrocarbons. The general formula for the k's is, accordingly, $C_nH_{2n+1}-C:O-C_mH_{2m+1}$. A k. is often designated by the names of the two univalent hydrocarbons which unite thus with carboxyl to form it, prefixed to the term k.; thus methylethyl k. is $CH_3-CO-C_2H_5$. [B, 4.]—Aromatic k. A k. derived from a secondary alcohol of the aromatic series, $C_nH_{2n-7}-C:O-C_nH_{2n+1}$; i. e., a univalent hydrocarbon of the fatty series (methyl or one of its homologues) united with a univalent hydrocarbon of the aromatic series (phenyl or one of its homologues), with the intervention of the radicle carboxyl (CO). LACTIC ACID, n. La2k'ti2k. Lat., acidum lacticum. Fr., acide lactique. Ger., Milchsäure. A monobasic acid, $C_3H_6O_3$, discovered by Scheele in 1780; hydroxypropionic acid. Various isomeric modifications of this formula are known: 1. Ordinary l. a., l. a. of fermentation, optically inactive ethylidene l. a., the acidum lacticum of the U. S. Ph. (Fr., acide lactique; Ger., Milchsäure), $CH_3 - CH(OH) - CO.OH$, a body derived from the fermentation of milk, and forming with water a sour, syrupy liquid, from which the acid can not be separated in a pure state. What is usually termed lactic acid is really a mixture of the anhydrides of the latter with a peculiar gum, the product of the lactic fermentation. Ordinary l. a. is found in the gastric and intestinal juices, and, under certain circumstances, in the urine. The salts of ordinary l. a. constitute the various lactates. L. a. has moderate soporific properties, and has been used as a solvent of diphtheritic false membranes. 2. Optically active ethylidene l. a., paralactic acid, sarcolactic acid (Ger., optisch active Aethyliden-Milchsäure), a body closely resembling the former, and having the same structural composition, but differing in its power of rotating the polarized beam to the right. It occurs in the muscular juice, especially after a muscular contraction. 3. Ethylene l. a. (Ger., Aethylenmilchsäure), $CH_2OH - CH_2 - COOH$, a sour, syrupy liquid occurring along with paralactic acid in the muscular juice. 4. Hydracrylic acid (q. v.). The l. a.'s are a series of acids, $C_nH_{2n}O_3$. They comprise two isomeric groups, the normal l. a.'s corresponding in constitution to the diatomic alcohols, and having the graphic formula $\frac{C_n-/H_{2n}-2OH}{CO.OH}$; and the isolactic a.'s having the general formula $C\left\{\begin{matrix}(C_nH_{2n+1})2OH \\ / \\ {}_nCO.OH\end{matrix}\right.$, and being formed synthetically from oxalic acid. $C_2H_4O_2$] by a series of substitutions which are equivalent to replacing one atom of oxygen in the acid by two molecules of an alcohol radicle of the C_nH_{2n} series. LAURUS (Lat.), n. m. La^{4}r′(la^{3}′u^{4}r)-u^{2}s(u^{4}s). Gen., laur′i, laur′us. Fr., laurier. Ger., Lorbeer. It., lauro, alloro. Sp., laurel. 1. A genus of plants formerly including most of the laurels, but now limited to two species having (Bentham and Hooker) the following characters: Flowers polygamous, usually 4 in the involucre; segments of the perianth, 4; stamens, 12 to 20, rarely fewer. The laurels (Lat., Lauraceæ [Lindley], Fr., lauracées; Lauri [Jussieu], Fr., lauriers; Laurinæ [Ventenat]; Laurineæ [Jussieu], Fr., laurinées; Ger., Laurineen) are a highly important order of aromatic plants of the Daphnales, distinguished (Baillon) by the following characters: The absence of stipules, the regularity of the flowers, the concavity of the receptacle, the double perianth, the valvular dehiscence of the anthers, the single anatropal descending ovule, the indehiscent monospermous fruit, and the absence of albumen in the matured seed. The laurels of Meissner include (1) the true laurels (Fr., laurinées vraies), shrubs or trees with the fruit usually superior and the cotyledons plano-convex, as in the genera Cinnamomum, Camphora, etc.; (2) the Cassytheæ (Cassytha); and (3) the Gyrocarpeæ, shrubs or trees with the ovary inferior and the cotyledons spiral, as in Illigera, etc. By Baillon the laurels are made to comprise the Cinnamomeæ (13 genera), Cryptocaryeæ (12 genera), Ocoteæ (12 genera), Tetranthereæ (10 genera), Cassytheæ (1 genus), Gyrocarpeæ (2 genera), Illigereæ (1 genus), and Hernandieæ (1 genus). Bentham and Hooker reject the Gyrocarpeæ and Illigereæ from the order, which, according to them, contains 34 genera arranged in the following tribes: Perseaceæ (containing 23 genera, Persea, Nectandra, etc.), Litseaceæ (containing 9 genera, L., Sassafras, etc.), Cassytheæ (Cassytha), and Hernandieæ (Hernandia). The Laureæ (Fr., laurées) of Reichenbach are a division of the Laurineæ. The Lauroideæ of Pax are a suborder of the Lauraceæ, comprising genera with bilocular anthers, and including the Apollonieæ, Cryptocaryeæ, Acrodiclidieæ, Laureæ, and Cassytheæ. LECITHIN, n. Le[2]s'i[2]-thi[2]n. From λέκιθος, the yolk of an egg. Fr., lécithine. Ger., L. A term for a class of bodies, $C_3H_5(C_mH_nO_2)(C_pH_qO_2)OPO[O(OH)_2.C_2H_4N.(CH_3)_3]$, derived from the tissues of the brain and nerves, from amniotic fluid, from yolk of egg, from bile, from spermatozooids, and from certain vegetable substances. All are derivatives of glycerin, formed by the substitution of the molecules of 2 fatty-acid radicles for 2 molecules of hydroxyl, while the third molecule of hydroxyl is replaced by a molecule of neurine in combination with phosphoric acid. According to some autborities, the neurine in these compounds loses the elements of water before combining with phosphoric acid, and the formula will therefore be $C_3H_5(C_mH_nO_2)(C_pH_qO_2)OPO[O_2.C_2H_4.N(CH_3)_3]$. The l. obtained from the brain is by some authors said to be distearyl-l., $C_3H_5(C_{18}H_{35}O_2)_2.OPO[C_5H_{15}NO_3]=C_{44}H_{90}NPO_8$, and by others said to be palmityl oleyl-l., $C_3H_5(C_{16}H_{31}O_2)(C_{18}H_{33}O_2)OPO.[C_5H_{15}NO_3]=C_{42}H_{84}NPO_9$, or, according to Strecker, $C_{42}H_{82}NPO_8$. The latter formula corresponds more nearly to the results of analysis. The body is a hygroscopic, white solid of waxy consistence, soluble in alcohol, from which it crystallizes in acicular clusters, and insoluble in water. [B.]

[G.]—L. planus. Syn.: l. ruber planus, l. planus Wilsonii, dermatitis circumscripta herpetiformis [Neumann]. A papular or papulo-squamous chronic or subacute disease of the skin, attended with pruritus. The papules usually occur in circumscribed patches, sometimes in linear or curvilinear figures, situated most commonly about the joints of the extremities, often occurring symmetrically and occasionally becoming general over the body. They vary in size from miliary to lenticular, are of a brownish-red or purplish color, are flattened at the top, where the surface appears smooth and glistening with a slight appearance of umbilication, while at the base they often show an angular outline. Often there is a little adherent scale at the summit of the papule, and when a number of papules in a group become confluent the surface of the patch feels rough, hard, and horny (l. planus corneus). On disappearing, the papules leave dark-colored pigment stains and slight atrophic depressions. [G.] Cf. L. ruber acuminatus.—L. planus annulatus, L. planus annulatus pruriginosus [Vidal]. A variety of l. planus in which rings are formed whose borders are externally steep and abrupt, while interiorly they are ill defined and inclose slightly atrophic or almost normal centres. [G.]—L. ruber acuminatus. Ger., rothe Schwindflechte. Syn.: l. acuminatus, l. exudativus ruber, l. psoriasis. A chronic cutaneous papulo-squamous disease usually associated with constitutional disturbance that may tend to a grave or even fatal form of marasmus. The eruption consists of hard, red, conical, miliary papules, each surmounted by an adherent crust or scale, and attended with itching. The papules gradually multiply till by aggregation the surface involved becomes uniformly covered by a rough, thick, horny crust, or else appears red, thickened, and deeply seamed. Beginning usually upon the trunk, the eruption tends to involve the entire cutaneous surface, though it may affect only certain isolated regions. The papules often occur in a linear arrangement along the natural lines of the skin, where they produce ridge-like elevations which, when the efflorescences are of unusual size, may resemble strings of beads (l. moniliformis). LICHENES (Lat.), n. m. pl. Li(le)-ken(ch2an)'ez(e2s). From λειχήν, a tree-moss. Fr., lichens. Ger., Flechten. 1. The lichens; a large order of perennial cryptogams, small in size, very variable in color, deriving their nourishment chiefly from the atmosphere, rarely green in color, consisting of a vegetative portion (see THALLUS) upon which the reproductive organs (see APOTHECIA, SPERMOGONES, and PYCNIDIA) are borne. By the earlier authors L. were regarded as terrestrial Algæ, while some modern authors have classed them with ascomycetous Fungi, from both of which they are distinguished not only by their slow development and long endurance, but by producing in their substance gonidia (q. v.), which under certain conditions are reproductive. Schwendener regards the L. as composite organisms consisting of Algæ and Fungi living together as host and parasite. The L. have been variously divided, according to the importance attached by the authors to the vegetative or reproductive organs. Nylander, the leading lichenist, considering the combined characters of the thallus, apothecia, and spermogones, arranges the L. into three groups: Collemacei, Myriangiacei, and Lichenacei. L. were once extensively used in medicine as demulcents, febrifuges, etc., and some were considered specific in certain diseases. It is said that no poisonous species is known. [B, 1, 19, 121, 170, 173, 180, 291 (α, 35).] 2. LIME, n. Lim. A.-S., lim, l. Lat., calx, calcaria. Fr., chaux. Ger., Kalk. It., calce. Sp., cal. A substance obtained by calcining certain minerals (such as limestone) which consist essentially of calcium carbonate. This is a white mass, usually amorphous, but also obtainable in crystals, having a great affinity for carbon dioxide and for water, and converted by contact with the latter into calcium hydroxide, or slaked l. On account of its affinity for water and the heat evolved in its combination with the latter, it exerts a caustic action when brought into contact with living tissues. It is not fusible at any temperature yet attained, but when heated to incandescence gives an intense white light. LIQUID, n. Li^{2}k'wi^{2}d. Lat., liquidum (from liquere, to be liquid). Fr., liquide. Ger., Flüssigkeit. It., liquido. Sp., liquido. A body which flows; i. e., one the cohesion of whose particles is such as to be readily overcome by the force of gravitation, so that the body changes its form without suffering any alteration of its volume, and completely fills the most dependent portion of the vessel in which it is placed. It differs from a gas in presenting no tendency to change its shape except when acted on by an extraneous force and in resisting any attempt to alter its volume. LIQUIDAMBAR (Lat.), LIQUIDAMBRA (Lat.), n's n. and f. Li^2-kwi^{2}d-a^{2}m(a^{3}m)'ba^{3}r, -bra^3. From liquidus, liquid, and ambra, amber. Fr., liquidambar (1st and 2d def's), copalme (1st def.). Ger., Amberbaum (1st def.), Liquidamber (2d def.). It., Sp., liquidambra (2d def.). 1. A genus of trees of the Hamamelideæ. The Liquidambareæ (Fr., liquidambarées) of Baillon are a series of the Saxifragaceæ. The Liquidambreæ of Dumortier are the genus L. (see Balsamifluæ and Altingiaceæ). 2. Liquid amber (or liquidamber); of the Sp. Ph., the sweet gum or balsamic product of the L. styraciflua, known also as American l. It is a yellow, somewhat transparent liquid, of a honey-like consistence, a terebinthinous balsamic odor, and a warm, bitter taste, becoming hard and brittle by exposure to the air. It contains a volatile oil, a semiconcrete substance which is separated in distillation from the water by ether, cinnamic acid with a hardly appreciable proportion of benzoic acid, a yellow coloring matter, an oleoresin, and a peculiar principle called styra-cin (q. v.). It is aromatic and stimulant, is considered styptic, and is often substituted for the balsams of Peru and Tolu, as well as for liquid storax, with which it has been confounded by many authors. The term l. is sometimes applied to the products of L. orientale and L. altingiana. [B, 95; B, 5, 18, 19, 121, 173, 180, 275, 496 (a, 35).]—American l. See L. (2d def.).—Liquidambra altingia (seu altingiana, seu cerasifolia). Fr., copalme altingia. Ger., altingscher Amberbaum. The rasamala of the Javanese and Malays; a tree found in the Indian Archipelago, Burmah, and Assam, yielding a fragrant balsam which is a stimulating expectorant and is said to be mixed with true storax. This has been erroneously identified with balsam of Peru. In Burmah the tree yields two varieties of the balsam—one yellowish and pellucid, obtained by incision, and the other dark and opaque and having a terebinthinous odor, obtained by boring the stem and applying fire around the trunk. [B, 5, 18, 173, 180, 496 (a, 35).]—Liquidambar copal (Fr.). See Liquidambra styraciflua.—Liquidambar du Levant (Fr.). [a, 35.]—Liquidambar orientale. Fr., copalme d'orient, liquidambar du Levant. Ger., orientalischer Amberbaum. The Oriental sweet gum, liquid-storax tree, or lordwood; a tree growing in southwestern Asia Minor. It is the source of liquid storax, the styrax of the U. S. Ph. [B, 5, 18, 173, 180, 496 (a, 35).]—Liquidambra styraciflua. Fr., copalme à feuilles d'érable, liquidambar copal. Ger., amerikanischer (oder virginischer, oder mexikanischer) Amberbaum, Guldenbaum. Bilsted, copalm balsam-tree, sweet gum; a North American tree growing from Connecticut and Illinois, southward to Mexico and Guatemala. The bark is said to be an efficient remedy in summer diarrhœa and dysentery, especially in children. The leaves and capsules have an aromatic odor when bruised, and, according to Procter, are acid to the taste and to litmus. The tincture of the fresh leaves is acid and astringent. In warm latitudes the tree yields by incision l. (q. v. [2d def.]). Another product, thicker and darker than l., and resembling liquid storax in properties, is said to be obtained by boiling the young branches in water and skimming off the fluid which rises to the surface; in Texas this resin is used for coughs. [B, 5, 18, 121, 173, 180, 275 (a, 35).]—Oriental l. Liquid storax. [a, 35.]

A glandular organ having for its chief functions the secretion of bile and glycogen and to impress upon the blood passing through it certain ill-understood changes. In man it is the largest of the glands, and is situated in the abdomen, on the right side, immediately beneath the diaphragm. It measures transversely from 10 to 12 inches, antero-posteriorly from 6 to 7, and about 3½ at its thickest posterior portion; it weighs from 90 to 100 ounces and is of a reddish-brown color. Its upper surface is convex, following the curvature of the lower surface of the diaphragm, the lower being concave and broken by its divisions into lobes. The posterior edge is rounded and thick, the anterior thin and sharp. It is divided into the left, right, caudate, and quadrate lobes and the lobe of Spigelius, is indented by the transverse and longitudinal fissures, and by the fissures for the ductus venosus, the gall-bladder, and the vena cava; it is held in position by the coronary, right and left lateral, falsiform, and round ligaments. It is covered by the peritonæum, beneath which is a thin fibrous layer continuous with the capsule of Glisson and the areolar tissue separating the lobules. Its substance is made up of the hepatic lobules united by connective tissue and ramifications of the portal vein, hepatic artery, ducts and veins, and the lymphatic nerves and lymphatics. [A; L.] 2. A disease of cattle, characterized by fever, jaundice, tremors, swelling of the abdomen, great prostration, and usually by fatal issue; said to be produced by eating various species of Lupinus. Ordinary lupines, however, do not produce these symptoms, and hence the disease has been attributed to various Fungi (Uredo, Erysiphe, Cladosporium, etc.) found on the plants or, with more probability, to some principle developed in the latter by a fermentative process and identical either with the icterogenous principles extracted by Liebscher and by Kuhn, or with the lupinotoxin of Arnold. Lupine or white lupine; an annual species, probably of Egyptian or east Mediterranean origin. The seeds, semina lupini (seu lupinorum, seu lupinorum sativorum), fabæ ficulneæ (seu lupini), are poisonous in the raw state, but, when they are boiled, the poisonous property is removed, and they were used as food by the ancients. Bruised and soaked in water, they have been employed internally as diuretic and emmenagogue, and especially as anthelminthic, and externally as an application to wounds, ulcers, and swollen glands, and in various cutaneous complaints. A cellular new growth, of the nature of granuloma, takes place in the corium and sometimes also in the mucous membrane, as of the mouth, throat, nose, etc., giving rise to macules, papules, tubercles, or nodules of the surface, which tend to undergo degeneration followed by atrophy of the skin with desquamation of the epidermis or by ulceration with formation of cicatrices. According to its varying clinical features, different varieties of the disease have been described. Occasionally little pits are left behind. [Crocker, "Lancet," July 13, 1878 (G).]—Cancer l. L. associated with epithelioma. The disease commonly occurs in patches of various shapes and extent upon which the surface is red, congested, and scaly, while the centre of each patch tends to become slightly depressed, whitish, and atrophic. In the region of sebaceous glands the scales are of a greasy character, and are provided with little prolongations that dip down into the orifices of the dilated follicles. Where the follicles have undergone atrophy or in situations, as upon the palms, where they are absent, the scales are thin, dry, and adherent. When occurring on the face, it frequently spreads in the form of two large patches, one on each cheek, united by a narrow patch passing over the nose, the whole resembling a butterfly in shape. The eruption, which may be more or less acute in its development, is attended with fever and with pains in the head, bones, and joints. MAGNESIA (Lat.), n. f. Ma2g(ma3g)-ne(na)'zi2(si2)-a3. Gr., μαγνησία (from μάγνης, a magnet). Fr., magnésie. Ger., Bittererde, M. It., Sp., m. Originally, black oxide of manganese, so called from confusion with magnetic iron ore. This was subsequently called m. nigra, and the term m. alba was given to what is now known as magnesium carbonate. When the metallic elements existing in these two bodies were isolated, the metal of the m. nigra was called manganese, to distinguish it from that of the m. alba, and the term m. nigra was dropped as being no longer in accordance with the changed nomenclature. As at present used, the word m. signifies magnesium oxide, MgO. This substance is a fine, light micro-crystalline or amorphous powder, obtained by the calcination of magnesium carbonate; it is odorless, has a slightly alkaline taste, and shows a faint alkaline reaction when moistened; it is insoluble in alcohol and only slightly soluble in water. When heated to a very high point it fuses, and on cooling solidifies into a hard, vitreous mass. It is also obtainable in a crystalline form. When occurring in the form of powder it is designated, according to its density, light m. and heavy m. The m. of the U. S. Ph. (m. levis [Br. Ph.], m. calcinata [Belg. Ph., Roum. Ph.], m. usta [Ger. Ph., Russ. Ph., Roum. Ph., Gr. Ph.], magnesium oxydatum [Austr. Ph., Swiss Ph., Hung. Ph.], oxidum magnesicum [Finn. Ph.] [leve (Swed. Ph.)], oxydum magnesicum [Netherl. Ph.] [leve (Dan. Ph., Norw. Ph.)], magnésie calcinée [Fr. Cod.], óxidomagnésico [Sp. Ph.]) is light m., a light powder, white and fine, devoid of odor and having an earthy taste. The m. of the Br. Ph. is heavy m. (the m. ponderosa of the U. S. Ph.). [B, 3, 5; B, 95 (a, 38).] In the dual system of nomenclature of salts, the compounds of magnesium are designated as salts of m. and are regarded as the result of the direct combination of the basic m., or magnesium oxide, with an acid principle. Thus magnesium sulphate, $MgSO_4$, is considered as compounded of MgO and the radicle SO_3 found in sulphuric acid, and is therefore called m. sulphate. For English, Latin, and German names of compounds formerly designated according to this system as compounds of m., see under Magnesium.—Aerated m. Magnesium carbonate.
